New homeopathic compound remedies heal in short order

High-tech device is first to measure human aura with objective signals

“Gentle medicine” is steadily gaining ground: a German physician has, over the past few decades, developed a new naturopathic healing technique that can “melt away” ailments triggered by underlying emotional conflicts by means of innovative homeopathic compound remedies. With the aid of a high-tech device, therapists can determine the appropriate medications based upon subtle vibrational information from the patient. This represents the first time that an alternative-medicine therapy has bridged the gap with orthodox medicine.

Dr. Thomas Höhn carefully connects a cable to the wrist of a patient who is suffering from chronic pain, establishing a contact with the handy diagnostic device. The well-known doctor from the German TV channel MDR sets the front-panel switches to Vital energy and 10 percent. He then presses down on the upraised arm of the stressed-out businesswoman suffering from intolerable pain in her jaw. In this muscle test, the arm resists at first, but at a setting of 30 percent, it begins to go down. “For the first time,” says Höhn, “a person’s life energy can be measured objectively.”

Lately, more and more orthodox-medicine physicians swear by this subtle-energy test device—a core component of the revolutionary healing technique developed by the general practitioner Dr. Reimar Banis. Just two years after its introduction, about 400 physicians in Germany alone are making use of the method known as Psychosomatic Energetics. In the USA, Canada and Australia, this ingenious subtle-energy treatment method for emotionally based ailments is causing a sensation, and is well on the road to reconciling the long-term rival camps of orthodox and alternative medicine.

This healing technique can not only measure the four levels of a person’s life energy (vital, emotional, mental, causal), which correspond to the four frequency ranges of an EEG, the sensitive test system is also able to identify physical/mental disorders and their underlying emotional conflicts, as well as propose the appropriate therapy using innovative homeopathic compound remedies. The various drop combinations are designed to have a healing effect on a total of 28 negative emotional states.

In the past, it took years of psychotherapy to uncover underlying pathogenic emotional states. “Now it only takes less than 10 minutes,” says TV-doctor Höhn, based on tests and treatments of his patients.

“Before this, the connection between body, mind and spirit could not be objectively represented,” says Dr. Höhn happily about the swift identification of etiology. A neuralgia patient of his reacted quickly: a mere half hour after taking the 12 drops prescribed for her individual emotional state, her pain was gone.

What might seem at first glance to be a healing miracle has become routine for Dr. Reimar Banis in his private practice. “When it comes to highly sensitive people, children and even animals,” says the inventor of the emotional remedies, “healing can take just days or even hours.” Normally though, this short-term psychotherapy with drops lasts for 4 to 6 weeks, and up to a year in the case of large conflicts.

The mixtures of plant, mineral and organic high potentiations are used mostly for ill-defined vegetative ailments, for which the usual orthodox-medicine tests such as blood count or laparoscopy provide no information; this includes bedwetting, insomnia, lower back pain, shortness of breath, irritable bladder, Globus sensation in the neck, tinnitus as well as cardiac arrhythmia, depression and stomach ulcers.

But Psychosomatic Energetics can even come to grips with very serious syndromes such as epilepsy. There are documented cases in which the number of epilepsy attacks went from five a day down to once a month—after a mere four weeks of therapy. Quick results are also possible in Parkinson's cases. A naturopath from the lower-Rhine town of Rees was, as he put it, astonished when one of his Parkinson's patients, considered basically incurable, stood up from his wheelchair after a mere month of the healing drops. “All of a sudden his body was just full of energy.”

It is above all the (seemingly) hopeless cases with “imagined ailments” who seek out energy-medicine physicians, who proceed according to the basic assumption that the underlying emotional background must first be brought to light before healing stimuli can be applied.

“Since these energy-draining conflicts are almost always located in subconscious emotional regions,” says Reimar Banis, “Psychoenergetics is a kind of midwife to the unspeakable in the Psyche.”

It took nearly three decades of meticulous work for Banis to catalog the symptomatology of the interrelationships between specific homeopathic agents and the 28 pathogenic basic sensitivities that he had identified. Banis says that it's like trying to “catch a stampeding herd of cattle with a big net.” Whereas conventional homeopathy, using a time-consuming procedure, treats an ailment with a predetermined potentiation of one specific agent, presenting a single-point stimulus, Banis surrounds the underlying emotional problem with a grid made up of at least four medications with different potentiations.

This makes it very hard for the energy thief to escape as it is being “gently melted away.” By contrast, conventional homeopathy and Bach Flowers therapy work more like a “shotgun, hoping to graze the disease,” says the naturopath.

What does science have to say?

Even mainstream science now confirms, to its own amazement, the effectiveness of the gentle medicine from Swabia. “I know of no other therapeutic method,” says Günter Haffelder, head of the Stuttgart Brain Research Institute, “that has such a strong effect on human brain waves.” As their tested and prescribed Emotional drops dissolved on their tongues, the EEG readings of test subjects exhibited markedly improved brain performance. “The two halves of the brain were in sync with each other,” said physicist Haffelder with surprise. “New neural nets were built up, and the cranial stress diminished almost immediately.”

And so the emotional drops quickly blossomed from a useful psychotherapeutic supplement to an independent subtle-energy healing system. “Amazingly enough, the drops alone are often all you need,” says Reimar Banis. “In most cases, the emotional self-healing process proceeds without a hitch, gently and simply.”
